CHALLENGES

The Hallman law firm had been migrating toward greater use of digital records for several years. As their practice evolved beyond local cases, the ability to work anywhere at any time became critical.

The idea of working in the cloud was attractive; however, they had legitimate concerns about security and access surrounding this innovative technology.

At first, Hallman Law Office worked with a different cloud company for about a year - until they could no longer put up with constant glitches that cut into their productivity.

With the robust protocols of Cloudnine and its redundancy, Hallman felt enthusiastic and confident they had found the right technology partner.

SOLUTIONS

Hallman Law Office's initial research put Cloudnine in the top tier of providers, but it was their interaction with Cloudnine reps that sealed the deal according to owner W. Eugene Hallman:

"Their people are very knowledgeable and place the customer first. We've had few problems. When we do, we receive immediate attention, and our issue gets resolved quickly."

Hallman Law Office has recaptured time previously devoted to IT maintenance, upgrades and troubleshooting. They can now focus on the work itself. Dealing with servers, updates, and compatibility is a thing of the past.

"Files and programs just work - when we need them, where we need them. Simply put, we all get more work done and I sleep better at night," says owner Eugene Hallman.

Hallman Law Office is another example of how a firm switched from conventional, in-house servers to Cloudnine's scalable solutions.

"We stopped worrying about IT issues. Cloudnine takes care of everything now. We can use our local desktops simultaneously with our cloud programs. It's the best of both worlds."
